Save and Survive

It is estimated that $500,000 American families are installment credit for everything from babies to retirement. At the end of August, our consumers had $26 billion outstanding.

Installment buying must have its commendable advantages or so many people would not be using it to enjoy today's countless conveniences while they pay for them. Like many other good things, however, credit can be carried to excess.

Dexter H. Koser, family financial expert for The Week Magazine, claims that when the installment debt for the family reaches above 20 percent of the take home pay, the family is in a bad way. Look and listen before falling on any credit hook.

One may also feel sure he has about reached the limit of his credit when he is unable to pay his bills. Worry over debt can affect one's health and destroy one's happiness.

According to studies made by three universities found that people who live within their means live longer than the debt-ridden, but they also mental and physical distress for a longer time.

Intelligence says to "save money to live" and "live on credit" is a sure way to ruin one's health and happiness. It is a sure way to ruin one's health and happiness.

Remember then are they who save something for the future. They are the ones who live longer and live better.

The question, philosophers and economists should you live on credit or you live on cash? Live longer, live better and abundantly by building your financial future and survive.
